Producer-writer of “Raising Flag”

Eugene filmmaker and artist Nancy Miller’s long collaboration with her husband, Neal Miller, previously resulted in the critically-acclaimed “A Matter of Principle” – which also starred Alan Arkin and Barbara Dana.

Nancy has always been fascinated with all forms of art. When she isn’t working on screenplays with her husband, she is typically in her studio, creating eclectic sculptures or digital stories using both video and still photography.

Originally from the Midwest, Miller received her B.A. degree from Wellesley College and her masters from NYU, after which she taught school in Puerto Rico and New York. Her love of art eventually drew her into representing artists and she traveled the country selling their work (as well as her own) to architects and interior designers.

Nancy met Neal in 1973, and settled down with him in his native Chicago where he was renovating Victorian apartment buildings. She soon began to run their company, New Century Management, and served as general contractor on several construction projects. Over the years, Nancy has continued to manage the properties which often provided the resources necessary to produce the acclaimed body of work from their company, Rubicon Productions, Ltd..
